Helping D.C. residents fight cancer

In May 2013, the District of Columbia approved a proposal from Johns Hopkins to establish a new proton therapy center on the campus of Sibley Memorial Hospital. Now under construction at a total cost of $140 million, the new center will make proton therapy – which targets tumors more precisely and causes less damage to healthy tissue than conventional radiation – more readily available to residents of the District and the surrounding metropolitan area. The new facility is scheduled for completion in 2017.
